

פריילעך פאר קינדער

דבר תורה

In this week's Torah portion, Behaalotecha, we read about the lighting of the menorah in the mishkan. The menorah was a symbol of light and divine presence, with its seven branches representing the seven days of creation.

One interpretation of the menorah is that it represents the idea of spreading light and wisdom to the world. Just as the menorah illuminates the darkness of the mishkan, we are called to bring light into the darkness of the world around us.

In the same way that the menorah needed to be continuously fueled with oil to keep its flames burning, we must also continuously work to fuel the light of knowledge, kindness, and compassion within us. It is important to actively seek out opportunities to bring light into the lives of others, to uplift and inspire those around us.

As we go about our daily lives, let us remember the message of the menorah - to be a light in the darkness, to bring warmth and hope to those in need, and to always seek to spread goodness and positivity wherever we go. By doing so, we not only illuminate our own path, but also brighten the world around us.

Story Time

Once, a man came to the Rebbe asking for a blessing for his son, who was about to undergo a risky surgery. The Rebbe listened attentively and then asked the man, "Do you have a dollar?"

Surprised, the man replied, "Yes, Rebbe, I do."

"Give it to me," the Rebbe said. The man handed over the dollar, and the Rebbe promptly gave it to charity, saying, "Now, go tell the surgeon to do his job, and everything will be fine."

The man was puzzled by this interaction but followed the Rebbe's instructions. To his amazement, the surgery was successful, and his son recovered fully. When he returned to thank the Rebbe, he asked about the significance of the dollar.

The Rebbe explained, "Before your son's surgery, you had a dollar. Now you have a son. The value of a dollar can't compare to the value of a life.

By giving that dollar to charity, you demonstrated your trust in God's mercy. That trust brought about the successful outcome."
